Passage Three
There is something downright undemocratic about judging people's abilities on their looks. Yet looks matter a lot more in hiring and promotions than employers will admit to others, or even to themselves. Airlines and police forces have long had height and/or weight requirements for their staff, arguing that being physically fit and strong - not too fat or too small - is in the interest of the public. Scotland Yard requires its male employees to be at least 5 feet 8 inches ( 1.73 meters ) tall and female employees to be at least 5 feet 4 inches. But the Yard decided to accept shorter women a few years ago to give them a fair chance. Air France still requires its female cabin crew to be between 1.58 meters and 1.78 meters, and men to be between 1.70 meters and 1.92 meters. They must also have a "harmonious silhouette. " And British Airways grounds any member of its cabin crew——pilots excluded——if they are 20% over the average weight of their height. Being too small and too overweight is only one way that looks can have an impact on someone's career. Academic research at Edinburgh University, New York University and Utah State University shows that the better-looking a person is, the more positive qualities they are thought to have and the more positive impact that has in a career. There is some evidence, however, that: women who are too attractive——unless they are television commentators or have other high-visibility jobs——do not rank well as managers. "There is enough research now to conclude that attractive women who aspire to managerial positions do not do as well as women who may be less attractive," said Gerald Adams, a professor at Utah State University and an authority on the subject. Some French employers and recruiters decide whether a manager is right for the job based upon looks. In some cases, morphopsychologists——a term coined by a French neuropsychiatrist in 1935——attempt to determine personality traits according to a job applicant's face, eyes, mouth, nose, ears and hands. "Unfortunately, morphopsychology has become a criterion for recruitment in France," said Bruno Vincenti with the Centre des Jeunes Dirigeants in Paris, the French employers' organization. "When it is used as the sole criterion, it is a catastrophe. " That's for sure.
