章节摘录

status and prevailing advantages and influence over other states. After WWII , as the leader of western freedom and democracy , the US began to seek for world hegemony through its tit-for-tat competition with the Soviet Union. After the Cold War , the US was universally recognized as the sole superpower. And in terms of the distribution of power , the US hegemony had very obvious characteristics. As Henry Kissinger noted that at the dawn of the new millennium , the United States was enjoying a preeminence unrivaled by even the greatest empires of the past. From weaponry to entrepreneurship , from science to technology , from higher education to popular culture , America exercised an unparalleled ascendancy around the globe. Especially in military arena , the US was far ahead of other countries. This predominant position offers the US the golden opportunity to establish unipolar hegemony. Some scholar thus asserted that the 20th Century was the American Century and so will be the 21st century. And in harmony with this , "absolute hegemony" and "Pax Americana" had been vigorously agitated within American administrations. Especially after the 9.11 Incident , George W. Bush made major adjustments to the US global strategy. With its strategic goal to consolidate US unipolar hegemony and its strategic focus on strangling the rise of rivals who seek to challenge the hegemonic position of the US , the adjusted global strategy further revealed the US neo-conservatism characterized by favoring war and unilateralism. Towards the rapid rise of China , a comparatively objective and practical attitude is adopted by the US government and its mainstream society who have gradually accepted the rise of China after careful observation. Generally speaking , they tend to be quite optimistic about the rise of China , holding that there's no sure evidence indicating that Chinese leaders are actively seeking to counter the power of the US , undermine the unipolar system dominated by the US and then replace.
