章节摘录

On Friendship 1 Few Americans stay put for a lifetime.1 We move from town to city to suburb , from high school to college in different states , from a job in one region to a better job elsewhere , from the home where we raise our children to the home where we plan to live in retirement. With each move we are forever making new friends , who become part of our new life at that time. 2 For many of us the summer is a special time for forming new friendships. Today millions of Americans vacation abroad , and they go not only to see new sights but also in those places where they do not feel too strange with the hope of meeting new people. No one really expects a vacation trip to produce a close friend. But surely the beginning of a friendship is possible? Surely in every country people value friendship? 3 They do. The difficulty when strangers from two countries meet is not a lack of appreciation of friendship , but different expectations about what constitutes friendship and how it comes into being. In those European countries that Americans are most likely to visit , friendship is quite sharply distinguished from other , more casual relations , and is differently related to family life. For a Frenchman , a German or an Englishman friendship is usually more special and carries a heavier burden of commitment.
