前言

In 2007, the Chinese economy continued to grow in a steady and rapid manner. Financial reform, financial management, financial supervision and regulation, and opening-up progressed smoothly and financial system remained stable. However, the deep-rooted structural problems in the financial and economic systems were yet to be resolved, while the economic and financial environment became even more complex both at home and abroad with uncertain factors increased. The China Financial Stability Report 2008 aims at reflecting the latest progress the financial system has made in reform, opening-up, innovation and development, providing an objective assessment of the state of financial stability and also signaling potential financial risks. This Report basically adopts the same structure as that of the China Financial Stability Report 2007, with attempts to use more quantitative analysis. After a general review of the overall state of financial stability in China, Chapter I presents an analysis of the impact of macroeconomic performance on financial stability. The next three chapters present an assessment of reform and development of the banking sector, the securities sector and capital market, and the insurance sector as well as their impact on financial stability, respectively. Chapter V focuses on the progress of financial infrastructure, and Chapter VI discusses the way systemic financial risks come into being, the framework for managing systemic risks and China's experience in managing such risks. The Report also includes 3 boxes that analyze and explore important issues that bear on China's financial stability.
