章节摘录

1. We used to think that technology would make our lives easier. 2. Inventions such as the motorcar and the aircraft have offered us unimaginable levels of personal mobility. Washing machines have freed women from having to toil over the laundry. 3. According to the author, aside from allowing work to spread into our leisure time, technology has also added the new burden of dealing with faxes, e-mails and voicemails. 4. A couple of centuries ago, nearly all the world's accumulated learning could be contained in the heads of a few philosophers. Today, those heads could not hope to accommodate more than a tiny fraction of the information generated in a single day. 5. His purpose is to keep him up with what is going on in his specialized field — entomology. 6. The confusion of endless choice. 7. No. About half the population is suffering under the stresses and strains of life today. 8. According to Paul Edwards, lots of people have a sense that if you're not stressed, you're not succeeding. Therefore everyone wants to have a little bit of this stress to show they're an important person. 9. The average American has gained five hours a week in free time since the mid-1960s. The gains are unevenly distributed between the sexes. 10. It is meant that there are more and more debates on how many years people should work and whether longer hours or shorter hours working policies should be adopted, etc. 11. Here Godbey makes a comparison. The kid in the candy store is more often than not attracted by a wide variety of good candies and doesn't know which to choose. This is true of us, too. There are so many good things to do, but we don't have enough time to do them all. 12. The author points out that a more successful remedy may lie in understanding the problem rather than evading it. We should have "fewer desires" and "set boundaries for ourselves." .....
