章节摘录

The controversy has been characterized as pitting civic duty against individual conscience—one cherished American value against another. Recently, the battle lines were drawn over the removal of a sculpture inscribed with the ten commandments from a government building, a municipal courthouse. Meanwhile, middle America charges that oversensitivity and political correctness govern many decisions on religious matters. In another highly publicized case, town officials argued that decorating a fir tree standing in a public space in December did not necessarily constitute an endorsement of Christianity. They lost. The Christmas tree came down. What is in dispute is that 90 percent of Americans express some religious affiliation and approximately 70 percent claim to practice their faith actively. Religion has always been a voluntary activity in the U.S.A., so those who practice their faith do so by choice, as a matter of individual conscience. This may account for the high degree of observance, the depth of fundamentalism, and the wide variety of religions. With about 190 active religious sects, religion in the United States is a buyers market with some 33 million congregants claiming to have jumped ship to a different denomination.
