章节摘录

The first day of the new school year is supposed to be fairly relaxed. We get together with classmates we haven't seen all summer, have a look at our timetables and find out which teachers will be taking us for each subject. There were rumours at the end of last term that this year old Mr Ling would be our class teacher. And there were other rumours that he would soon be retiring. So we were not sure really what to expect when we turned up on the first day. Mr Ling was the strictest teacher in the school. He hardly ever smiled, knew exactly when you were making something up or covering for a classmate, and had an uncanny memory about mistakes you had made, even after you had forgotten them yourself. He had eyes in the back of his head and had an uncanny way of knowing everything you were doing or thinking. Some students were convinced that the classroom was bugged and that he recorded our conversations during the breaks. They said that having Mr Ling as the class teacher was worse than being in a World War II concentration camp. So it was with genuine relief and enthusiasm that we greeted our new teacher, Mr Peng, when he strode into the classroom on the first day of term. Mr Peng was a completely new teacher to the school. He had been transferred from Shaolin in Henan Province. He was in his forties, strong and energetic, nothing like old Mr Ling with his bony hands and creaking joints. Our enthusiasm was short-lived, though. Mr Peng's first words to us were: "I want this room kept spick and span at all times. Woe betide anybody who makes a mess."
